

Additional liability coverage is important

Would I be covered under my homeowners policy if I am sued by someone who was seriously injured on my property?

Your homeowners policy will protect you, but only up to the liability limits of your policy and, then again, only if bodily injury or property damage is involved. In today's lawsuit-oriented society, your homeowners policy may not provide adequate liability coverage in the event you are involved in a significant lawsuit.

What about my automobile policy?

Similarly, your automobile policy provides coverage in the event of a vehicle-related lawsuit, up to the limits of the policy, for accidents that occur in the United States.

What would happen if I was held liable for a settlement that exceeded the limits of my insurance coverage?

You would be held personally liable for paying any portion of the settlement that your insurance company does not cover. Your present assets—your home, your savings account, your car, and other assets you might have—also could be taken to pay the settlement.

Do I need an umbrella policy?

Umbrella policies are flexible, and they provide broad coverage.

Umbrella policies also known as excess liability policy—provide additional liability coverage that becomes effective when your underlying coverage limits (provided by your automobile policy, homeowners policy, etc.) are exceeded. They provide broad coverage and help protect you against certain losses not covered by your other insurance.

Umbrella policies are a good investment—help protect your present and future financial security.

If you're weighing the pros and cons to decide—look around your home at everything you have amassed and then ask yourself, how you would feel if you had to sell them in order to pay off the settlement that exceeded your insurance? The lower your insurance liability limits the greater chance this could happen. The price for protection is more affordable than you think.
